One of the most popular games out on the casino floor, blackjack is still shrouded in a fair degree of mystery. Players who sit at the tables to participate in the almost-ritualistic gameplay that has been around since at least the 1400s seldom ask themselves the question of how many decks are used in blackjack. [...]

Gift cards look like credit cards, with a barcode or magnetic strip. They do not necessarily have names on them, so they can be given to anyone. Instead of a name, they have a unique code so they can be recognized when used. Gift cards have barcodes on a different place on the card than credit cards do, so they cannot be used at ATM machines. Data on the cards is encrypted to stop counterfeiting. That way gift cards are safe, since they have zero value until they are sold. Only then the cashier will top up a desired amount to the card. That amount is in the store's database which is cross linked to the card ID instead of it being stored on the card itself. Some of the gift cards are activated only by calling a certain number for activation.
