Considering an extensive search of legal records revealed just two relevant cases, they're so small as to resist analysis. How would this work, exactly? Is the state monitoring the online activity of every citizen? Are online casinos and poker rooms reporting their customers to state governments?

With the legal climate for online gaming becoming milder, the shift toward online casino gaming is easy to see.

Despite popular opinion to the contrary, placing a real-money bet on a Web-based game of slots or blackjack is still legal for citizens of the USA.

Internet-based casino gambling has had a rough go of it in America the past few years. The passage of the UIGEA in 2006 and the Black Friday backlash of 2011 have done a lot to damage the reputation of legitimate online betting businesses. With state governments (and the federal government) looking for new sources of tax revenue, and some US states already relaxing their existing legislation, it's clear that the legal status of Web-based betting in America is secure for some time to come.

With the complicated nature of the online gambling industry, with both the inherent inability to control the Internet and regulate international businesses, the United States has not been able to effectively ban the online gambling sites. When begging the question over whether these online casinos are legal in the United States, it is somewhat easier just to say that they are not illegal, but they are also unregulated. Since every state that allows some form of gambling heavily regulates the industry, it is difficult to say whether a lack of regulation inherently makes these gambling sites illegal. A few states have banned online gambling in all forms, but this is mostly targeted at starting a gambling site rather than playing at them. In Washington state the games are illegal for the player. Nevada, Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Louisiana, Montana, Oregon and South Dakota also have their own laws pertaining to the legality of playing with an online casino.

As with any other form of gambling, we implore you to check into your state's online gambling laws, perhaps with an attorney, prior to gambling, especially if you are really concerned with whether or not you can actually get in trouble for something as harmless as online gambling. Above anything else, do not attempt to ever bypass the minimum gambling age that has been instituted in your state, as this is a great way to very quickly lose any money before you even have a chance to win.

Why this focus on so-called "payment processors?" Put simply, the processor is the lowest-hanging fruit for the government to go after. That's because the federal government doesn't have a legal leg to stand on when it comes to challenging the private gambling habits of its citizens. The intended result of this attack on banks was to make life difficult for Americans who gamble online – and the UIGEA has certainly accomplished that.

Of course not. Both men in the example above were caught in unique situations – one of them was heavily-involved in an underground network of online bettors that hardly resembles the majority of commercial sportsbooks and casinos most US customers join. The odds of being caught and prosecuted under these laws make it more likely that you'll win a huge progressive jackpot than that your friendly state police will come knocking at your door.

The US government has more stringently regulated online gambling. Some of the federal laws that encompass online gambling include the Federal Act Wire of 1961 and the UIGEA (Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act) of 2006. The former outlaws interstate wagering on sports but fails to address the other forms of gambling. The latter did not explicitly ban online gaming. However, it disallowed US-based payment processors from participating in any financial transactions involving online gaming services. These rigid regulations made most online gaming operators decide to move their businesses offshore where they can be left untouched by US federal laws.

To put this in perspective, consider that casino games with a 15% or higher house edge tend to be considered highly unfair. Furthermore, the odds of scoring a large win are extremely low. As a result, you should only play the lottery for fun and without expectations.

It may seem that the United States has been very slow when it comes to reacting to online gambling. Good news – prosecution by a US state against an online gambler is a very rare event. I can find just two cases where an online gambler broke an existing law, and both come from politically-conservative states. Neither bettor spent time in jail – though probation and fees are a pain in the butt, they’re a fair sight better than a prison sentence.

Usually, the platform with the largest market share offers a better product, while smaller competitors try to carve out their own share by offering more attractive welcome bonuses.
