Sometimes, if you're not playing at a best paying online casino, your chosen operator may refuse to pay out winnings. Before you start the complaint procedure, there are a few things you may want to check first. These things include wagering requirements, KYC procedure and progressive jackpot payout policy.

Let's say you did all the hard work from the steps explained above. Let's also say that you have met the wagering requirements, completed your KYC procedure and checked the jackpot wins policy. In that scenario, where you did everything necessary on your part and the operator won't pay your winnings, it's fair to conclude that additional steps are needed.

Luckily for players in such situations, there are several ways for them to force safe online casino sites to pay their winnings. This is especially easy in case their chosen operator is licensed by leading authorities such as the UKGC or the MGA. These authorities, alongside independent bodies, will make sure that iGaming operators keep their side of the bargain.

Not everyone is familiar with the existence of ADR providers or, more precisely, Alternative Dispute Resolution providers. These centres help players solve any disputes they may have with their iGaming operator. However, before contacting an ADR, players should try and resolve the matter with the operator. There are lots of ADRs on the market, but not all of them are accepted by the UKGC. Hence, UK players should check the list of licensed ADRs before contacting one of them.

Resolver is an association with Money Saving Expert, which is the biggest consumer advice website in the UK. This free tool helps consumers, online gamblers included, to raise as well as resolve issues. Generally, the UK Gambling Commission works with a long list of approved ADRs and encourages consumers to contact them in case of disputes. Nonetheless, players at any UKGC licensed operator do have the right to contact the authority as well. So, anyone having an issue with a British gambling site can reach the strict UKGC via phone or e-mail.

Besides the UKGC, the Malta Gaming Authority is probably the second best-established iGaming authority. The licensing body has strict requirements for licensees and takes good care of consumers. Thus, anyone having a dispute with an MGA-licensed casino site can submit a formal complaint via the MGA website. The form requires basic personal details, information about the operator and description of the incident.
